FOUR CORNERS

EVERY

Mnemosyne sought stories in every part of the four far flung corner of the world (of Greece, that is). All in the service of your task: Bend the paper's corners backwards. Angles on the back (which align with corners) bear important information. Copy curves and lines to make, from the fragments, a sentence of four small words. That's your hole card. Good luck!

Step 1: Bend the corners back and copy the letter fragments into the boxes to spell the four words.

Step 2: Read every fourth word of the original instructions.

Step 3: Poke a hole in the angles on the back with curved letter pieces next to them, then read the letters in the boxes on the front that have holes poked into them.

In her younger years, Mnemosyne gaddad about aimlessly, collecting tales. But when she got older she buckled down and got serious: she invented writing, she presided over one of the local oracular caves, and she gave birth to the nine muses.

Compared to the extreme productivity of her later years, how did Mnemosyne describe her youth?
(and, coincidentally, your evening)
